

How far Black Twitter has come

By Rebone Masemola

11 Apr 2019

Black Twitter is defined as a movement and "cultural identity consisting of some Twitter users from around the world who use the social network to address and drive interest around issues that affect the black community" - Feminista Jones. This space was first imagined by black Americans living in different parts of the United States in an effort to build a virtual community of people who shared one another's lived experiences, this collective of users would use the platform to garner support and share stories about being black in America.

Image source: Getty/Gallo Images.

A similar Black Twitter space with a different mission emerged in South Africa in 2010, and its mandate was to virtually 'bring together' a collective of actively conscious black middle-class users on this platform to engage on a variety of socioeconomic, political issues and sometimes lighthearted social commentaries and banter around Sunday night television.

The difference was that Black Twitter in South Africa was unintentionally exclusive and closed off in relation to the US format. This space was indirectly reserved for the few people who could intellectually engage on a depth of dialogues that were historically reserved for academic spaces because of the language barrier. Since then, the space has gone a little bit more mainstream.

Romanticised court of public opinion

Black Twitter in South Africa has become an autonomous space that has grown a life of its own. Over the years, the platform has become a romanticised court of public opinion that is being led by the black professionals who now have the power to influence headline news stories and what makes it into the front pages of the biggest media houses locally.

Black twitter: New court of public opinion

Rebone Masemola 21 Oct 2015

We've even witnessed some of its leading twelebs (Twitter celebrities) make it into popular culture as pseudo influencers and celebs, thus local media houses no longer shy away from referencing and or quoting tweets from the Black Twitter-verse. One of the biggest things to come out of this space has been its ability to make and break brands, thus as self-elected speakers and representatives of all things black, they stand for what's in the best interest of the group by calling-out and cancelling both personal and corporate brands that undermine black culture and black people.

The platform has also become infamous for activating and igniting conversations that were historically reserved for private spaces with people you trust, Black Twitter has blurred the lines between the private and the public. The community now uses their social power and currency to disrupt and hold those in different positions of leadership and corporate brands accountable for their misgivings. Thus historically, brands and marketers had no interest in marketing to this group because there was not enough disposable income going in and out of the black community owing to the financial gap left by apartheid.

But since 1994, there has been a growing middle-class community that has garnered the interest of companies and brands, and often, these brands still fail to create narratives that truly reflect the lived experiences of these new class of black consumers. In the last few years, we've seen many create products and content that poorly misrepresented the black people and their culture, with Black Twitter leading online conversations that sort to critique and scrutinise such narratives. In the last year, we've seen a shift by the users who wanted to take their influence one step further.

Boycotting brands

Online bashing was not enough to hold such brands accountable, so more offline efforts needed to be taken to essentially devastate the commerciality of implicated brands. Hence the idea to boycott brands that misrepresent black people was born, H&M was one of the first to feel this protest when their global business created an ad that portrayed a black boy in a sweater that made black people feel like he was being equated to a monkey. In South Africa, this ad resulted in people boycotting the stores for a short time after it came out.

Brands, Black Twitter will come for you if you are not careful

Khangelani Dziba 31 Jul 2017

The biggest backlash from the Twitter-Verse came to life when a white male whose family owned local businesses that predominately targeted black consumers (because they were in areas with mainly black people) uploaded a video from his holiday in Greece boasting about being on a beach with no black people, Black Twitter would hear none of it.

Fig 3.

The black conscious consumer

Thus, the rise of Black Twitter has ensured that black consumers understand their power as a majority, employing them to exercise it to disempower and dismantle brands and companies that take them for granted. Empowering them to use their financial power to hit those brands where it hurts, in the pocket. This was such an important shift in the mindset and behaviour of this consumer segment because historically Black Twitter was only seen as a platform with a bug greater than its bite.

The social backlash coming out of this space didn't seem to have any real-world impact outside of social media, so it was noise that brands could easily ignore for a long time since it had no impact on their business margin. This new educated middle-class consumer no longer takes their buying power for granted, they've stopped underestimating their ability to cripple the financial success of a business that takes no accountability for how it represents the interests of this black and conscious consumer.

In this competitive market, black consumers now have the power to exercise collective choice in a market that offers them alternatives. Consumers now have the upper hand to influence purchasing behaviour, and Black Twitter has helped to actively enforce that power on the ground when it matters the most.

ABOUT REBONE MASEMOLA

Rebone Masebola is the founder of a digital Feminist platform called the WokeProject, she's a Marketer, and writer who advocates for equality and fair representation. She's a TEDx Speaker who currently works as a Digital Marketing Manager for an international TV Network.

- The decade of the chosen family - 5 Mar 2020
- How far Black Twitter has come - 11 Apr 2019
- On the humanisation of black stories in 2019 - 15 Jan 2019
- Creating brands that influence an intersectionally inclusive world - 9 Oct 2018
- #YouthMonth: What's in a hashtag? - 30 Jun 2016

View my profile and articles...