It is a crisis mirrored across the developing world: loans so huge that government struggles to repay the debt. But Malaysian prime minister Mahathir Mohamad would not have it. On a visit to Beijing this week, he accused his host of luring nations into a trap with easy loans for projects they don't need.

“We do not want a situation where there is a new version of colonialism happening because poor countries are unable to compete with the rich,” Dr Mohamad said.

He was referring to a string of contracts signed by his predecessor, Najib Razak — who was voted out of power in May — including a railway along the east coast of Malaysia, several ports and four man-made islands with plans to build swanky apartments for rich buyers from China.

After winning the election, Mohamad’s coalition published documents showing how some of the money was used by Najib to fund his party while millions have reportedly gone missing.

Assets taken for debt

In December last year, Sri Lanka was forced to give China a strategic harbour at Hambantota, 80 kilometres south-east of the capital, Colombo, and more than 15,000 acres of land, all on a 99-year lease because the country was no longer able to service a loan. Ironically the borrowed money had been used to develop the port at Hambantota.

At $14bn, Sri Lanka's global debt, much of it to China, is close to what the state earns in a year.

Members of Mohamad's cabinet have voiced concern at Malaysia going the same way and the PM did not hold back when he told the New York Times that China was willing to "lend big sums of money to poor countries", to develop projects, but when the loan falls into arrears, China will, "take the project for themselves," he said.

He has cancelled a number of big-ticket loans and set up a commission to investigate claims of corruption.

Angola has seen its debt to China rising to a point where Luanda is now critically short of cash.

And China has courted Zimbabwe, retooling power plants and other utilities along with talk of two new rail lines to the east through Mozambique.

Beijing has lent more than $90bn to African governments and state-owned companies.

In July, president Xi Jinping and South Africa's Cyril Ramaphosa signed 10 agreements worth $14.7billion (about R220.5 billion), but the Chinese ambassador to Pretoria, Lin Songtian, said there was nothing to worry about.

"China will never repeat the actions of the colonial era," Lin told a local newspaper. "We won't come here to exploit and run away."

Africa at risk

According to a report from the Centre for Global Development, the country most at risk is Djibouti, an enclave that controls one of the world's busiest shipping lanes from the Indian Ocean to Suez.

Goods from Asia and Africa squeeze through a narrow strait with Djibouti on the left bank and war-torn Yemen on the right.

The government of President Ismaïl Guelleh has negotiated loans that amount to almost 90% of GDP, with China holding the lion's share. Both the USA and France have military camps here, but China has built its own with space for more soldiers than the other two combined.

And the same firm that worried Mohamad are present. The China Railway Engineering Corporation worked on Malaysia's eastern line and has built a new track from land-locked Ethiopia to Djibouti.

Mohamad is scrutinising an oil deal with the Chinese National Petroleum Corporation who are working on a gas field in Djibouti.

"You look at a map," says Malaysia's deputy defence minister, Liew Chin Tong, "and you can see where China is plotting ports and investments from Burma to Pakistan, Sri Lanka and on toward Djibouti."

But whereas Malaysia and Sri Lanka have enjoyed a change of government, largely brought on by claims of corruption, Guelleh wins more than 80% at every poll in what opposition groups claim is a rigged vote.

With most MPs loyal to the ruling party, the president is rarely held to account. The port is the country's biggest earner but in February he issued a decree cancelling a management contract with Dubai-based DP World, alleging the firm had not performed adequately.

When a London court ruled that the contract to run the container port remained valid, Djibouti simply rejected the finding. DP World has made clear it will not surrender its rights.

In Washington, several congressmen have made known their fear that China might eventually base warships at the harbour on the only southern route to Suez.

Guelleh has repeatedly said he remains an ally in the war on terror and that neither the US nor Europe has anything to worry about.

But Sri Lanka is proof of how things can go awry when sovereignty is swapped for debt.

With Robert Mugabe no longer in power, Dr Mahatir Mohamad (93) is the world's oldest head of state and has been in politics for decades. "It's all about borrowing too much money which we cannot afford and cannot repay," he said.

For Djibouti, the warning may already be too late.
