

Return of the F1 King?

Yes he might be coming back, I don't know if the heading would give it away but if you guessed somewhere along the lines of Michael Schumacher, then you would be right. The seven times World Champion will be subject to physical tests on his "slight" neck injury he sustained in a motorcycle accident last February, the outcome of which will no doubt influence his and others decision of his return.

Schumacher fills in for an injured Felipe Massa for the Valencia Gran Prix, obviously the Ferrari team was the only place he would re-ignite his career, and he might be replacing Massa for the rest of the season. We all know if Schumacher performs like he did seven years back then it would go without saying that Ferrari will keep him at the helm.

As Gran Prix fans lie in anticipation for the results of his physical; I can only imagine the anxiety of the other teams. What if Schumacher does return? What happens if he performs like he did couple years back? All these questions are floating around the F1 world. If I could only be a fly on one of the team's walls you'd be reading what I heard.

Sabine Kehm Schumacher's agent said that his neck injury could still hamper his return.

"Michael is committed 100 per cent to his return and is completely immersed in preparations for the Valencia meeting... It all depends on his health and the doctors' opinion."

Although Schumacher admitted that he still feels a slight twitch.

"... all in all, training is going pretty well. I only have to admit that my neck pinches a bit," he said on his website.

Well then we're just going to have to wait and see. If he does make a comeback I guess I'm going to have to follow the F1 again.
