

It's time for Africa to bet on itself

 By Bronwyn Williams

19 Oct 2020

Last month, I read Henry Kissinger's World Order. It was a fascinating read—particularly for someone like myself who is interested in the macro macro trends that guide the currents of human history—the slowly shifting tectonic plates geopolitics, the rise and fall and rise again of kingdoms and empires. The book covers the major expansionary empires of history and the shifting balances of power from the Middle East to the Far East, the West and back again.

Where is the African narrative?

However, what struck me was the absence of Africa in this grand narrative of human strategy and struggle. From a historical geopolitical stand point, Africa as a whole appears to have been cast as a supporting actor in the battles between warring, expansionary global empires, rather than as actor with agency in its own right. This is surely a mistake.

“ It is time for African nations to take control of the script and write our own stories—as lead actors in our own right—rather than submitting to the whims of other nation's world views. It's time for Africa in general and South Africa in particular to bet on itself, rather than being a pawn in the global game of empire, and there has never been a better time to do exactly that. ”

2020 has shown us the weaknesses of the globalist project, and highlighted the trade-offs we face between the efficiencies (economies of scale) of global supply chains and the resilience of local value chains.

Now, with both physical limitations placed on global trade and financial limitations being erected through trade and tariff wars, we now have an opportunity to make and buy locally. We have an opportunity to build resilient local value chains that retain value, profits and jobs within our own communities. We have an opportunity to invest in virtuous circles of our own making rather than participating in vicious cycles designed to meet other nation's objectives.

Build, make, buy local

We are already seeing this mentality shift. South African retailers such as Mr Price and Woolworths are committing to investing in local manufacture and supply chains. Major malls have noted an increase in consumer demand for local boutiques and South African branded stores. Payment companies have been impressed with the growth of local SME e-commerce.

The challenge now for consumers and brands alike is to put our money where our values lie. Do we want to export our wealth or invest and re-invest in our own communities? Are we using local suppliers whenever we can? Are we purchasing from local businesses? Are we investing in local start-ups? Are we betting on ourselves? Or are we still playing someone else's game?

ABOUT BRONWYN WILLIAMS

Futurist, economist and trend analyst. Partner at Flux Trends.

- #PulpNonFiction: Local books worth reading and gifting this holiday - 20 Dec 2021
- #PulpNonFiction: In search of utopia - 13 Dec 2021
- #PulpNonFiction: Free Britney and other true conspiracies - 6 Dec 2021
- #PulpNonFiction: On the contrary - 29 Nov 2021
- #PulpNonFiction: The tail of Pan narrans - 22 Nov 2021

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>